- Approximately one nautical mile north of Kihelkonna on the island of Saaremaa there is a landing stage about 60 meters long and six meters wide with a small rump running into the water. Depth alongside the landing stage is three to four meters. Behind the landing stage on the coast, which is wooded, there is a white house which probably houses the soldiers who serve as coast guards.
- 2. The landing stage is used by two BO-class vessels and several small armed motorboats and patrolboats, all belonging to the coast guard. One of the patrolboats was numbered 235. (Comment: This patrolboat is probably of the PI-type.) The crews were marines and the word HOTORPATR was written on their cap bands. The smaller vessels were engaged in laying buoys on the south side of a channel leading to the landing stage.
 - 3. One of the RO-class vessels left the landing stage in the morning towing a target and returned again in the evening.
 - 4. Discipline among the coast guard vessels' crew members appeared to be very lax. For example, enlisted mon did not take their hands out of their pockets when they were addressed by officers. Neither the crews nor guards on the landing stage saluted their efficers and the guards often smoked during their watches. The changing of the guard was slovenly executed. The uniforms worn were heterogeneous.
 - 5. Civilians were allowed access to the landing stage to a limited extent. Old women, for example, were observed selling eggs there.
